

Laura's eclectic writing career includes television, film, theater, web series, fiction, and news. Behind the scenes, she has helped production companies develop movies, TV pilots, and limited series. She has taught pitching workshops at several MFA programs and universities, including UCLA, USC, Boston University, National University and Stephens College.

A graduate of Yale University, Laura has won awards for journalism, television writing, and fiction. Her short stories have appeared in multiple anthologies, including the upcoming Malice Domestic anthology, Murder Most Edible. Her podcast, Destination Mystery (DestinationMystery.com), features interviews with mystery writers and combines her love of books with her background in journalism.

Her children's book, Nana Speaks Nanese, tackles the confusing changes brought on by dementia in reassuring and straightforward way. She hopes it will help families facing a diagnosis of dementia open up a conversation with their children. A second children's book, Papillon, is set to come out in late 2019.
